What is working well

The Events page clearly explains when a search has no matches and suggests changing the search. Coach profiles also show placeholders while their details load, giving visitors visible feedback rather than a blank screen.

Three things to fix first

1. Make every search filter easy to identify.
The location and sport filters have visible values, but Chrome exposes no name explaining what each control does. This can make finding a suitable session harder for people using reading aids. Ask your developer to add clear, permanent labels connected to each filter and check the remaining filters too.
Check: have the developer demonstrate that a screen reader announces both the filter purpose and its selected value.

2. Make text easier to read.
The browser accessibility checks flag weak text/background contrast on both the home and Events pages. Some visitors may struggle to read this text, particularly with low vision or in bright light. Ask your developer to identify the flagged text and choose clearer colour combinations.
Check: ask to see the affected text before and after, then repeat the two accessibility checks to confirm those contrast warnings are resolved.

3. Make missing pages report that they are missing.
The test address /no-such-page-123 shows a helpful missing-page message, but the website sends a success response behind the scenes. This can confuse services that check broken links. Ask your developer to return the standard missing-page response while keeping the friendly message and home link.
Check: open that same invented address and ask the developer to show that it returns status 404 while the recovery link still works.

These priorities address essential search controls and readability first, followed by the accuracy of missing-page handling. The review covers selected public pages and does not establish accessibility across the entire service.

Thank you for providing a service that helps visitors discover coaches and group activities.
